ePhoneNumbers Customers Prepare in Anticipation of Google Voice Port-In Service

When Google Voice opens up new registrations and port-in service, our customers will be prepared, will you?

LAS VEGAS, April 14 /PRNewswire/ --

Recently there has been a buzz across the internet about Google Voice, in particular the ability to port-in a phone number for use with the service. So what does this mean exactly? Up to this point, users have been able to port-out their phone number, but with this new idea, Google would allow users to port in any number they currently are using.

The idea is that Google Voice (formerly GrandCentral) would allow users to port any number into the service. This could include any phone number you currently have, all be it a cell phone number, home phone number, business phone number, even any new phone number you obtain either from getting a new phone, or from our company, and so on.

Many of ePhoneNumbers customers have purchased numbers from our company in anticipation of Google's port-in service. In the mean time, we encourage users to begin giving out their new phone number immediately, and similar to Google Voice, we forward their calls and text messages to any phone, allowing the customer a smooth transition into their new phone number.

Google Voice promises to simplify communications, by way of providing users with one phone number connecting to all their phones. Wouldn't you want to be able to pick that number from thousands of available numbers?

Google Voice Giveaway

To mark this occasion, we have five Google Voice (GrandCentral) accounts we are giving away and each giveaway includes the choice of one brandable, memorable number from our inventory, call forwarding to the Google Voice account and if Google opens the porting-in process, we will port the number to the winner's Google Voice account.
